

Jade Brant

All twenty one of these photographs were made during the first COVID-19 stay-at-home order in California, which lasted from March 19 to June 15 in 2020. I was drawn to preserving moments that felt delicate and fleeting. Looking back now, two years later, the photographs speak of distance and boundaries, of fractures and cracks, of give and take. They resonate with the energy of today, a state of flux that is suffocating, confusing, and difficult to navigate. I am passionate about documenting domestic spaces and how they express the relationship between cultural history and individual memory.
